Having a global perspective has given me the privilege to realise that the future is already here.

It's just not evenly distributed, especially in developing countries. And I felt that that was something that we could also bring to the community in Southeast Asia.

Hi, I'm Joel Neoh, I'm a founder and entrepreneur. Today I find myself in a world of digital, technology, entrepreneurship, and most recently, healthcare.

So for me, community is deeply personal. It's the people who believe in what I do. Whether there's team members, partners, customers, even critics. Because they are engaged in making sure that we build the company that impacts the lives of the community that we serve.

So honestly, I find that pivots can be really tough, but what I've learned along the way is that if we have open communication with our stakeholders, we can turn that setback into an opportunity to build trust.

So the one piece of advice that I offer is that people and communities has to be the centre of the business.

And if we do that, we go beyond transactions and we build relationships and success that truly matters.
